You are George von Altenburg (65):

You've been managing the family company's hedge funds since you married your wife Dorothea. Although she brought the company and the money into the marriage, you alone have made yourself what you are today: incredibly rich and prestigious. Success suits you well and – contrary to what your jealous competitors claim – it was not from luck. You earned the millions through sharp trading and hard work. Of course, you wish your only son had looked up to you and had eagerly learned by watching every step you took. But you've been disappointed with Alexander from the time he took his first step. No internship, no expensive private schools, and none of the mentors provided to him could steer him in the right direction. Instead, through drugs, parties, embarrassing episodes with women, and catastrophically failed business endeavors, Alexander has taken your money and dragged your family name through the mud.

And, to make things even worse, your wife is now demanding that you leave the business to your useless son. Years ago, when you still had some love left for Alexander, you signed a clause allowing him to take over the business when he turned 30. But letting him assume command now means forfeiting your life's work. Due to him, your business is currently in a crisis. How could you possibly turn over your position to him?

Despite all your concerns, your wife was still campaigning for Alexander to be your successor and she came up with a plan to improve his reputation. Every Wednesday, the hugely popular TV show The One runs on almost every television set in the country. Even those who are not actively following it can't help but see news about the show on social media or hear about it in the office. This year your son has become the new Rose-Bearer. You have to acknowledge that Alexander has staged himself very well as a pure, honest, and charming bachelor ready to start a family. But you know him. That's why you can't let your wife and son go through with this charade.

The show's producer, Nina King, is a pragmatic person. For a small fee, she agreed to spring a trap for her star. The plan was to publicly expose Alexander in the final broadcast. Then, you brought Cheyenne into the plan – she would seduce Alexander while secretly recording it all. This would be broadcast after Alexander's very public engagement to another woman. This would destroy your son's carefully crafted image. In a stroke you would be able to distance yourself from him once and for all, thereby saving everything you've worked on all your life. After all, even your wife would have to realize that Alexander wasn't fit to run the family business.

Cheyenne was really extremely well cast in the role of the seductress. So well that even you fell for it and began an affair with her a few weeks before the show began filming. Not a big emotional thing – after all, you are a family man – but there was enough sex, time, and expensive gifts so that you would have a certain claim to ownership.

Apparently, the trashy show has always included a family date in the finale. During this date, the candidates usually get to know the Rose-Bearer's parents and so you've flown to the Maldives. But this has all come at a great cost to you. Cheyenne didn't just flirt and canoodle with Alexander as agreed. Now she's also demanded more money from you for the planned exposé. When she tried to blackmail you and threatened to ruin your life's work, you finally knew you had to settle things with her once and for all.

After Nina brought Cheyenne into the Dream Suite, you made your way to her up on the balcony unobserved. But Cheyenne wasn't ready to drop her demands. Within minutes, things escalated into an argument. Leaning on the balcony she turned and threatened you when she said, "If I want, your life will be over, George." You saw red and pushed Cheyenne over the balcony railing with all your strength. All you heard was the sound of her crashing into the bottom of the empty pool.

You murdered Cheyenne Aleon. You can lie during the game, but you should keep close to the truth, if possible, so as not to get entangled in contradictions. You have knowledge of the deed that can expose you. So be careful what information you share with the others.

Personal goal: Avoid being accused of murder by blaming it on someone else.

Your appearance: Of course, a man of your wealth always wears a bespoke suit, even in warm weather. Those who recognize the finer things realize the watch on your wrist is worth more than a new sports car.

Your feelings about the others:

Cheyenne Aleon (victim): If she'd simply stuck with the plan and hadn't tried to take control from you, she would still be alive.

Samantha Edwards: Although this candidate is incredibly sexy, she's certainly not good enough for the name "von Altenburg."

Nina King: You have respect for this hardheaded, competent woman. You trust her to finally ruin your son's reputation.

Benjamin Ballhaus: The cameraman is sloppy and unreliable. You have absolutely no respect for artists and softies.

Alexander von Altenburg: You're looking forward to the day your son is excised from the family and will no longer be a burden for you.

Judith Freud: Psychotherapy is only for the weak, like your son. She should just keep away from you with her nonsense.

Ella Newhouse: This girl seems to have really taken a fancy to your son. She seems sadly naive, simple, and without character.
